CIRION & EORL & THE FRIENDSHIP OF GONDOR & ROHAN

(i)

The Northmen and the Wainriders

The Chronicle of Cirion and Eorl¹ begins only with the first meeting of Cirion, Steward of Gondor, and Eorl, Lord of Éothéod, after the Battle of the Field of Celebrant was over and the invaders of Gondor destroyed. But there were lays and legends of the great ride of the Rohirrim from the North both in Rohan and in Gondor, from which accounts that appear in later Chronicles,² together with much other matter concerning Éothéod, were taken. These are here drawn together briefly in chronicle form.

The Éothéod were first known by that name in the days of King Calimehtar of Gondor (who died in the year 1936 of the Third Age), at which time they were a small people living in the Vales of Anduin between the Carrock and the Gladden Fields, a remnant of the Northmen, who had formerly been a numerous and powerful confederation of peoples living in the wide plains between Mirkwood and the River Running.

Bournemouth is a large town on the south coast of England. It was a location that Tolkien frequently returned to for his holidays, staying in the same room at the Hotel Miramar: room 205. In the late 1960s, Tolkien retired to nearby Poole with his wife to escape the attention of Oxford. After his wife's death, Tolkien moved back to Oxford and lived at 21 Merton Street. In late August 1973, he visited Bournemouth to see some friends; it was here he finally passed away on September 2, aged 81.
