STORY

Joachim Müller-Lancé's Uppercut Angle is a rather sporting fellow, originally developed for the Krav Maga training center of San Francisco (Krav Maga is a simple, efficient self-defense system that has become popular in Hollywood and with law enforcement). Joachim has spent several years training, hitting things and people whenever he needs a break from kerning.

The design idea sprang from pencil sketches for the center's new identity, where it can be seen on the school's t-shirts and other articles. Uppercut Angle's shapes are not calligraphic or handwritten, but more like lettering seen in comics or sports logos. Its brush movements are imaginary — not too literally brushy. During development, details were simplified and reduced until a cut-paper feel had emerged, but more fluid like writing. The shapes are economical, their simplicity makes the font versatile, holding up well in both small and large sizes.

Uppercut Angle is decidedly analog, muscular but not bulky, with the fluid, determined movements of a boxer or martial artist — not theatrical but powerful, fast, confident and dynamic. In the proportions, there is emphasis on the upper edge "keeping its guard up", while some stems duck below, giving an impression of leaping or being "light on the feet".
